careful consultations by both sides, it is important as being a very full statement of the case, and also as indicating the line of defense, and negatively the plan of the prosecution, although both have been pretty clearly outlined. The question follows:

A homicide was committed by two brothers, thirty-seven and twenty-live years old, respectively, under the following circumstances:

The decensed when killed was thirty-two years old, and was the second cousin of the man who killed him. The brothers belonged to an honored and highly-respectable family. Their father died in 1904, and their mether in 1905, and on her deathbed she confided to the senior brother the care and protection of her youngest daughter, a sweet and innocent country girl, who was then about twenty-one years of age. All of the girls brothers were devoted to her. The relation existing between herself and the two mentioned, were always affectionate, and after their mother's death were particularly tender and loving. The younger brother and the sister in question, with another unmarried sister, continued to live at the old home after the mother's death. The deceased was the cousin and intimate associate of the children, and he freely visited the home; he professed the warmest friendship for all of its limites; he offered to stay at the house and look after the sisters when their brother was absent, and he often did so. The older brother lived three hundred miles away, but never forgetting the injunction of his dying mother, he made frequent visits to the old home, and always responded to the request of those there, and solictions affection. The accessed was regarded as the darnier and sultor of the young sith and it was supposed that after a while they were to have been married. No suspition that the deceased was betraying their confidence was entertained by either of the brothers until an occurrence on November 1st, 1966, made them fear that such might be the case. Their suspictions were allayed by investigation, their sister protesting her perfect innocence and begging her brothers not to humiliate her by calling on the deceased for an expirantion. They were somewhat doubtful, but their analety to be convined was such that the deceased had seduced their young sister a little before their mother dangerous operations to produce an abor-tion; that these estiminal operations were performed in Washington city, where he had carried her and placed her in the

at him. The elder brother ran downstairs and fired from the ground to the upper roof, where he thought he detected the deceased in a crossching position as if to spring. The younger brother fired from the window. The firing ceased, when there was a sound, indicating that the man had fallen on the upper roof, and on that roof he was a little later found by a third person mertally wounded. The time from the flight of the deceased toward the stairway until the firing ceased was a few seconds, and at most did not exceed forty-five seconds. No word was spoken while the tragedy was being enacted except that the married sister exclaimed, "Boys, he has gone," as he fied through the door and the newly-married wife screamed. The brothers were armed, but not for the purpose, or with the slightest idea of injuring the deceased that night or thereafter. Their uncontradicted stalement, made finder eath, was that they were overcome by the emotions which his flight implrised; that they were thrown into a frenzy and were beyond self control; nothing that the deceased, while subjecting her to this awful ordeal, still refused to marry her, and was far more cencerned for his own safety than for her welfare and life; that following the last operation the deceased became frightened, and against the advice of physicians put in peril the life of the sirl by insisting that she return from Washington to her horne, and this she did, though sick and weak and agonized in mind and body. The two brothers were terribly shocked and horrlifed by this revelation of the perfidy of a trusted relative and friend iowards one who was very dear to them. Their first thought was to exact as a penalty the life of the seducer and abortionist, but they restrained themstives at her pleading, that they should allow a marriage to take place and save publicity and scandal. This conclusion was stated to the deceased, and he expressed his intention and willingness to marry her whenever her brothers thought best or wanted it to take place. To this course they consented. The deceased tried to have the wedding postponed, and having almost hypotel influence over the girl, secured her co-operation in this effort. For some reason he was always averse to an immediate matrriage, but the brothers resolved that it should take place the evening of December 15, 1995, which resolves they communicated to him. They suspected that it should take place the evening of December 16, 1996, which resolves they communicated to him. They suspected that the deceased might endeavor to escape, and so accompanied him to the clerk's office, where the Ricense was issued, but permitted him to go home alone for the purpose of dressing for the eccasion, and then one of them conducted him to the house where the young girl was lying desperately Ill, suffering from the fleets of a uterine hemorrhage which had occurred the day bofore. The brothers in arranging the marriage and having the ceremony performed acted in the utmost good faith towards the deceased, they were willing as far as possible to forget the deceased, and at t

Captain Woods proceeded to cross-examine the witness for the purpose of eliciting information regarding his duties as a member of the medical staff of the government asylum for the insane in Washington. Witness admitted a great portion of his professional career had been devoted to treatment of epileptics. Captain Woods asked the witness to differentiate between rage and anger on the ntiate between rage and anger on the me hand and emotional insanity on the

Dr. Clarke replied that the act commit ted by the defendants could be divided into two parts, the first embracing all that occurred prior to the marriage, the The brothers were lod to believe from his constuct that he did not intend to remain and would leave unless watched, but they had no belief that while being watched he would attempt to escape, and therefore anticipated no serious trouble of any kind. They cared that his uitchaite intention was to cast off his siricken wife, but they had no purpose to punish him simply bequire there might be sick in hiteration in his mind. While she was in Wash ignon, very ill, he had left the young girl alone from 2 o'clock Thursday until 10 o'clock Friday night, returning before the operation resulted in an abortion, to so and see about his dogs, and his actions subsequent to the marriage impressed them with the fear that he might thereafter treat his wife with less consideration than be would accord one of them. They adminished him of his promises and his duty; they assared him that if he really wished to so to town with the purpose of returning, one of them would drive him in and bring him bach, but this suggestion did not nicet his approval. While the two brothers were downstains they and their married sixter concluded that there was danger of his learning, and that he ought not to be permitted to do so. At the instance of the older the younger went up to their sixter's before on, where the deceased had come a minute before, to let him see that he was being watched, and upon arriving found the window leading to the shed raised, and he believed that the deceased had round a minute before to let him see that he was being watched, and upon arriving found the window leading to the shed raised, and he believed that the deceased had round the window leading to the shed raised, and he had read and upon a riving found the window leading to the shed raised and he had read and upon a riving found the window leading to the shed raised for her arms about his peak. derangement?"

"No, sir."

Captain Woods took each one of the subsequent ovents up to a certain point, and asked the witness if they indicated mental derangement. Witness said "no."

But he thought the fact that James Strother ran down-siairs to intercept Bywaters and fired at him repeatedly, while not an index of mental derangement, was a part of the second part of the act committed wille defendants were laworing under emotional insanity. Captain Woods discussed anger caused by insults and wrongs. Witness Strother have been in churches and theatres have been known to cause emotional insanity. Said the witness.

fendants after the marriage discussed what they should do in case he showed any disposition to go off and determined to keep him there by force and afterwards did exactly what they determined to do, that which they did do, would the act be one of emotional insanity?"

Coursel for defense objected on the ground that no evidence had been adduced to show that there existed such a state of facts as assumed by the question.

Captain Woods argued for the admission of the question. The court hold that the prosecution could base a question on any fact the evidence tended to prove, and the witness was allowed to answer.

"The act under those circumstances would be one of deliberation," said witness.

Witness said accumulated provecations and accumulated provecations and insanity accumulated provecations and the causes might produce emotional insanity. The court took this view, and called Captain Woods and Mr. Lee to the bench to have the former explain, out of the hearing of the jury, what was expected to be proven by the question.

After a minute's whispered conversation counsel resumed their places, and Mr. Keith took up the examination, questioning as to the general nature of insanity, eliciting from witness the statement that insanity is "a diseased state of the mind."

The question was put in many forms, evidently designed to bring out an admission that under certain circumstances a man might be unable to control his acts. The witness was not a nentirely satisfactory one for the prosecution. In fact, from the viewpoint of the defense, Dr. Drewy made statements about as satisfactory as were those made by Dr. Clarke, atthough the Virginia allenist did not admit that the defendants were probably suffering.

At 1 o'clock the court took a recess of an hour, and did not reconvene until 2:15. The prosecution put William Payne on the stand as the first witness in rebuttal. Mr. Payne said he drow into town in a two-horse buggy on the 15th of December. He met Bywaters on the street in Culpeper about 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

"What did he do?" asked Mr. Keith, "We object," said Mr. Jeffries; but after a whispered explanation between counsel, witness was allowed to proceed, but had not gone farther than to begin a recital of what had passed between them when there was renewed objection by the defense, and the jury was withdrawn.

Captain Woods stated it was intended to show that James Strother was mistalton in saying that on the afternoon of the marriage, Bywaters, while Phil, was waiting to take him out in his buggy, was seen by the latter driving from his mother's house in a vehicle driven by a colored boy, and that when seen, Bywaters then get out and joined young Sirother, Young Payne explained that he gave Bywaters a "lift," and that the latter of his own accord got out and joined aman whom witness did not know.
